Reminiscences Of A Railroad Engineer

Synopsis

William Hasell Wilson (1811-1902) was closely identified with the onward march and development of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company's system from its very infancy, when with his father's corps in 1826; through the formative period of the organization, when the standard was set for high achievement which has since obtained; through the Civil War period, when, as Chief Engineer of the Pennsylvania Railroad, his Department of Maintenance and Construction was called upon to preserve intact the highway itself for the transportation of armies and munitions of war as well as the general public and freight traffic; through to the end of a professional career, embracing many positions of trust and responsibility, of exceptional usefulness and duration (actual service, seventy-six years). William Hasell Wilson was finally looked upon as the Nestor of his profession, respected, honored, followed, served by many a younger man of his own corps who can to-day rise up and call his name blessed.
